AUDIOSCRIPT

Poor Annie. It was a terrible night for her. I was at a tennis club party. Well, not a real party – we were having a big dinner together, about fifteen of us. It was good. I was sitting opposite Annie. We were talking about her family. She's got two daughters. One, Sasha, is at university studying economics and the other, Greta, is just sixteen and she's still at school. She's a good tennis player and I've met her several times. A nice girl. Anyway, suddenly Annie's phone rang. I knew something was wrong because her face went white. It was the police. They were at her house. When Annie left the house to come to the tennis club, Greta sent a message on the Internet to some of her friends and invited them round to her house for a small party. Then Greta had a shock. About a hundred people arrived. They learned about the party on the Internet. They drank alcohol, broke things and made a terrible mess in the house. Greta tried to make them leave the house but they refused to go. She had to call the police. The police say that this sometimes happens. There are people who check the Internet to learn about parties and then they tell their friends and they go to the address. It's a big problem. I took Annie home and she cried when she saw the house. Her best plates and glasses were broken and there was food all over the walls. The carpets were wet and dirty. It was terrible. Of course, Greta was crying too. But it's an important lesson. If you're having a party, don't put the information on the Internet. It's too easy for the wrong people to find it.
